As seen in the origin of offerings to the gods found in Atrahasis, Mesopotamian mythology could provide etiological explanations for cultural practices. One of the best examples is the myth known as Enmerkar and the Lord of Aratta, in which king Enmerkar and his rival from Aratta engage in a competition for the affections of the goddess Ishtar. As part of the competition, Enmerkar writes a message on a clay tablet and sends it to Aratta, inventing writing in the process (fig. 6, 7).
